BCM Partner becomes National Council Member

Ros Foreman, a partner at BCM is to be congratulated as she has recently become a national council member of the Institute of Agricultural Secretaries and Administrators. (IAgSA).

The IAgSA aims to promote and encourage professional excellence in rural business administration, helping business administrators and farm secretaries service the book-keeping and recording needs required by a diverse range of large and small businesses in the countryside. Incorporated in 1967, it is the only professional body representing those involved in any aspect of rural business administration. With a current membership of nearly 900, IAgSA has nationwide and overseas members who are responsible for administering tens of thousands of farming acres, and many members work with some of the most prestigious and cutting edge farming companies in the country.

The services they provide include Computerised and Manual Accounting Systems, Physical and Mandatory Record Keeping and Office Management and Computer Skills. They also provide a Continuing Professional Development Scheme.

Ros commented "I am delighted to become a national council member of such a prestigious organisation and look forward to this new role. I already help rural businesses across the South of England, and believe it is very important that small rural businesses in particular have access to professional help and administrative support."
